SHOULD BE ENCOURAGED.

The city council should, and it doubtless will, extend to the new owners and managers of the Utah Light & Railway company every facility for the proposed improvement of its lines. The rights of the public must, of course, be properly safeguarded, but there is no necessity for the introduction of harassing technicalities or any other matters tending to discourage this most important work.

At the meeting of the council and officials of the company Monday afternoon the latter announced their intention to begin at once the spending of several millions of dollars in relaying the tracks, in substituting heavy rails for light ones, in the purchase of new and better equipment and in the erection of an auxiliary steam plant of proportions sufficient to guarantee continuous street railway and light and power service. Every citizen desires these improvements installed.

Those who favor municipal ownership of street railways and lighting plants agree that the next best thing to public ownership is an efficiently managed private corporation. The character of the officials of the company, their long experience in the work and their ability to successfully carry out large undertakings is sufficient warrant for the statement that they will indulge in no trifling. They will do exactly what they say they will do. Every promise they make will be carried out, for they make no promises until they are sure they can carry them out to the satisfaction of all concerned.

The council can be a great help or a great hindrance in this undertaking. It can impose capricious obligations, it can cause delays, it can hamper the work in many ways. We would not have the council give to the new company anything that is not fair and just, both to the company and to the people. But every reasonable request made should be promptly complied with, to the end that there may be as little delay as possible.

Salt Lake City is entitled to and should have a first-class street railway system. It should have electric lights and power upon which it can depend at all times and under all circumstances. These blessings the company, with the co-operation of the council and the public, proposes to furnish. May the good work be speeded.

RAILROAD ARBITRATION.

There is considerable significance in the reported suggestion by several railway managers that hereafter wage disputes be referred to the interstate commerce commission for arbitration. An agreement of this character would certainly be a step in the right direction. The commission knows, or should know, when railroad employees are justified in making a demand for increased pay. The commissioners also know, or should know, when a railroad company is justified in cutting down the wages of its men.

Objection will be made to the reference of wage disagreements to the commission on the ground that the time of that body is now fully occupied with the hearing of rate questions. It sometimes takes years to settle a rate dispute. A wage question would have to be taken up and disposed of at once. Neither the corporation nor the employees would be willing to wait for an unusual length of time for a settlement. That is a point against the proposition, and it is about the only point.

Perhaps the objection could be met by the appointment of a special committee of the commission to handle matters involving wages, and it could be understood that all other matters would be temporarily sidetracked pending a disposition of the case. The public surely would like to see the danger of railway strikes averted. There is at present no intimation of a strike, but a government tribunal for the settlement of those matters is greatly to be desired.

ment of those matters is greatly to be desired.

The memory of the great strike of 1894, with its losses of life and property, has not faded from the minds of the people. They do not want a repetition of that performance, and the interstate commerce commission seems to offer a way to permanent peace. The really significant thing about the proposal, though, is the fact that it comes from the railway magnates, the employers instead of the employees. It is an indication that the old "public-damned" policy expressed by Commodore Vanderbilt is dying out. The railway managers are now willing to concede that the government and the people have an interest in their business, that the interest amounts to a right to inquire into affairs and adjust them when adjustment seems necessary.

REVOLUTION PENSIONERS.

It has developed that the report that the Revolutionary widow who died a few days ago was the last surviving pensioner of the War of the Revolution, was a mistake. A century and a quarter after that memorable struggle for human liberty there are three pensioners of the Revolution. They are all daughters of men who fought to free their country from England. One lives in Pennsylvania, one in New York and one in Connecticut. The youngest is 85 years old and the oldest is 88. Reports say that all are in first-class health and that they may survive for several years.

It has been nearly 100 years since the second war with England, the war of 1812. The pension rolls contain the names of 690 widows of soldiers who participated in that struggle. The indications are that some time will elapse before the last of these names is erased by death. The Indian wars fought prior to the war with Mexico furnish a remarkable record. Though the last of them was finished more than seventy years ago, there are 2,173 survivors on the rolls and 3,367 widows.

Fifty-eight years ago a treaty of peace between the United States and Mexico was signed. The soldiers who fought under the American flag in that conflict must have been an extraordinary healthy lot. Nearly 4,000 of them are drawing their pensions regularly, and the widows of 1,488 are receiving quarterly checks from the government. If the record of the Revolution may be taken as a criterion it will be sixty-five or seventy years more before the last of these names is stricken off the list.

POOR GEORGIA CAYVAN.

Georgia Cayvan, once voted the most popular actress on the American stage, died in a madhouse Monday. For seven years her mind had been a blank, and her passing was a merciful relief to her and to those who loved her. Behind the clouding of her mind and her passing from prominence to the seclusion of an asylum for the insane, there is a tragic story, the story of how a woman's life was ruined by the lying tongue of scandalous gossip.

Eight or ten years ago a New York woman sued her husband for divorce. In her complaint she alleged that the man had been criminally friendly with Miss Cayvan. The accusation was utterly and entirely without foundation. The truth was made known and proven, but in this world there is, unfortunately, a majority that believes the evil in preference to the good report. The many-tongued viper of scandal pursued Miss Cayvan. Wherever she went, innocent woman though she was, she heard its hisses and felt the effects of its deadly work.

For this woman there was no rest, and at last her trouble preyed so upon her mind that her intellect gradually clouded, the light of reason faded from her eyes and, seven years ago, as far as the world was concerned, she died. It was a pitiful, pitiful tragedy. The author of the scandal was as surely responsible for Miss Cayvan's death as though a quicker, surer means of assassination had been adopted. "He who fishes from me my good name robs me of that which not enriched him, and leaves me poor indeed," said one of Shakespeare's characters, the false Iago to Othello. The arrant scoundrel spoke for once words of golden truth. Georgia Cayvan, as the light faded, knew what it meant to be poor through the theft of her good name. Many another woman, many another man has known. No punishment severe enough for such a thief could be devised.

The business of the postoffice of any city is said to be the best possible indication of the condition of that city from the business standpoint. It is regarded by experts as an infallible thermometer. On this theory there can be no doubt as to Salt Lake's prosperity. Figures given in The Herald yesterday show that the business of the Salt Lake postoffice has increased tremendously, particularly the money order business. As people cannot buy money orders on credit it is obvious that they have a supply of cash. And they couldn't have the cash unless they were given a chance to earn it.

"Fighting Bob" Evans is sore because the naval appropriation is to be cut down. He declares we need more ships, more guns, more officers and more men. He was too modest to add that if we had a few more "Fighting Bobs" we could reduce the number of men, officers, guns and warships. But could we?

Emperor William is learning to play golf. On the day when he goes over the course without swearing or losing his temper he will effectually demonstrate that he is indeed able to rule a great nation.

SOCIETY

Yesterday was another big shopping day at Keith-O'Brien's. And the beauty of the heavy trade was the interest shown in Toys. The sale of Toys is opening up better than we anticipated. There is no question but that we have the largest stock in the city this year. The stock of Dolls alone is two or three times larger than last year's splendid showing.
